Dear Mr. Jongsma,

I was hoping I might catch you at home so I could verify the make and model of the elevator.

Can you please call or email so I can make an appointment to take photographs of the elevator?

Sincerely,

Dear Mr. Jongsma,

The staff at the U.S. Consumer Product Safety Commission read about the elevator injury at your home last week. We are the agency that monitors and regulates home elevators, and I would like to have access to take photographs and measurements to understand what happened and document which make, model and the manufacturer of that product. Mainly to take steps to prevent this from happening to other families.

I am a federal investigator with the U.S. Consumer Product Safety Commission (CPSC). The CPSC is an independent federal agency charged with protecting consumers from unreasonable risk of harm posed by defective or violative consumer products. We are authorized by law to conduct investigations and enforce federal safety laws and regulations under the Consumer Product Safety Act 15 U.S.C. § 2064, et seq. This agency's jurisdiction covers more than 15,000 products to include all terrain vehicles, household appliances, children's products, furniture, power tools and other consumer products. CPSC staff requests records and/or other official information from state and local entities to help CPSC carry out its mission.

Can you please call or email so I can make an appointment to take photographs of the elevator?

Sincerely,

Glenn Dunlap
